City and municipalities across the U.S. are facing unprecedented times as we continue to emerge from the pandemic and are faced with an uncertain economy.

Already a prime target for excessive loitering and vandalism, city buildings, such as libraries and parks, are a prime resting spot for those who are unhoused and others who might use the locations for things like panhandling or more nefarious activities. Setting up encampments, or using the shelter of buildings, alley ways and dumpster areas presents an added challenge of keeping the areas clean and with a sense of safety for employees and citizens alike.
